

Why I'm Not Selling Mine

People ask me — every week. 'If your rig is so bad, why don't you sell it?' Real answer. Today.

Selling it means someone else owns the defects I know about. I'd have to disclose. They wouldn't buy it at a price that covers what I owe. So I'd have to eat the loss.

Trading it in means the dealer dumps it on a young family who can't afford the inspector. They get the rig I know is broken. Not gonna do that to someone.

Keeping it means — I'm the one who knows what's wrong with it. I can manage it. I can fix it. I can warn other people through this channel. The rig becomes useful as evidence.

my wife and I talk about it every month. Same conclusion every time. The rig stays. The watchdog work continues. Sometimes the right thing is the inconvenient thing.

THE BOTTOM LINE

Anyway. Pour one. See you Monday.
